At Nutracap, I combined stock images to create layouts that provided a strong brand identity for each product. Using Adobe Illustrator, I added a variety of effects that made every label stand out. I created printing layers to designate different materials that would give the final product anything from a holographic to a metallic shine. An example of this is shown by the mock gold effect on the Anubis label.

Using this link (<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cagFt44nUT0>) you can watch a presentation that I animated for Global Payments. Using a mix of drawn and existing icons, the final animation, along with a voiceover provided by the client allowed them to quickly and clearly share information to their audience.

Below is a sample from a research report that I constructed for the William Mills Agency. I illustrated and designed the front cover and created a layout that made the entirety of the report engaging and easy to follow for the reader.

Front

Non-Traditional Competition and Partnerships

Financial institutions see the competitive landscape continuing to evolve, with technology companies such as Apple, retailers such as Starbucks and fintech firms vying for different parts of the financial services ecosystem. DeCastro refers to it as "being nibbled to death by ducks."

While digital-only and neobanks have had their challenges and other non-traditional competitors like payment apps tend to be point solutions that aren't seen as serious threats yet, financial institutions are feeling the impact to the point that they are seeking out fintech purchases (larger banks or partnerships (smaller financial institutions) to compete in the future.

"It's like any marriage," said Kimes. "When you ask how it's going, the marriage is great. But if you ask about taking out the garbage or doing the dishes, reactions are a little more critical. It's not a deal breaker. It's the difference between needing a divorce lawyer or a marriage counselor."

Survey: 81 Responses About Their Fintech Partners (Overseas)

Bank relationships with fintech companies have evolved over time, says Karl Danigian, managing director of BAI. While some see potential valuable partnerships emerging from fintech relationships, 42% of those surveyed by BAI said they have not learned something valuable from a fintech, and only 16% said they expected to acquire a fintech.

Can fintech help financial service organizations?

"2019 was a transitional year for banks bringing on banking services partners," said Mazurky, pointing to Google's partnership with Stanford Federal Credit Union, Sigfig, the financial technology firm that developed wealth management digital advice platform for several large financial institutions, and Marq by Goldman Sachs, which offers a range of financial services including unsecured loans, deposit accounts, and a new Apple co-branded card.

A NEOBANKS

Branchless digital banking app Chime, which grew from 15 million users in mid-2018 to more than 5 million by November 2019, suffered three outages between July and the end of October, leaving users unable to access their debit cards or to pay bills electronically.

The digital-only banks and other digital banking competitors, such as Kabbage, will often take riskier customers or pay more for deposits/charge less for credit than the community banks, according to Tweedie. So far, he doesn't see them having much of an impact on the smaller financial institutions, which rely on their customer relationships.

Kabbage is more established and better funded than many of the other non-traditional competitors, but has yet to face a recession, so the stability of the funding will be out to the test whenever that does happen, Banks says.

Others point out that many of these competitors offer only "point" solutions, rather than a full array of financial services. Even Intelliana, who tend to be the largest users of digital solutions, will seek relationships with financial institutions when their needs evolve from merely transactional (deposits, payments) to more complex (personal loans, mortgages, wealth management), according to Tweedie and co-founder of Sawyer & Jacobs, LLC.
